

Case study: How one School uses data to develop international mindedness and grow global citizens

Annette Rome, Principal and Dr Lydia Allen, French and History Teacher, St Margaret's Berwick Grammar School

Abstract

This presentation will respond to the PISA Global Competence Report: Implications for Australia and will consider how education responds to the requirements of the world in which our young people inhabit. While literacy and numeracy are crucial, there is a component regarding how young people learn to interact with others, particularly those that may be different to themselves. This presentation will trace key developments in international education and consider the transmissional, transactional and transformational elements that may need to be part of educating students to be genuine citizens of the world and how one school has attempted to understand and embrace these.
